3. Advocacy: The ABPN recognises the importance of advocating for child health policies that prioritise child and young people's well-being working in collaboration with colleagues across health, social care and education.

4. Undergraduate Education: The ABPN believe that field specific preparation of nurses is essential, whether that is for providing child centred care within family focused settings, supporting children and young people facing mental health challenges, managing consent, legal and ethical issues and managing the unique nature of childhood illnesses and long-term conditions.

5. Professional Development: The ABPN supports ongoing education and training to ensure children's nurses are equipped with the latest evidence-informed practices, technology, and knowledge in children's healthcare.

6. Collaboration and Research: The ABPN promotes collaborative efforts among and between health, social care and education professionals, researchers, and policy-makers to advance child and young people's nursing and improve clinical outcomes. We believe that includes research which acknowledges the child's and family's experiences of health services.
